The DaVinci Resolve Studio which is now available as free download from Blackmagic Design.Q: Efficient way to refresh a non-UI element once a control has finished refreshing itself I have a control on my page that is loaded and modified via an AJAX call. I am triggering a page reload after the AJAX call has returned and I want this to cause the non-UI element to be updated. In JavaScript I am just using `window.location.reload()`; but I feel like this is inefficient and have been told it may cause problems if the UI control has something like an autocomplete field on it, and there is a slight delay before the JavaScript fires. Is there a more efficient way of triggering the reload without that mentioned issue?

A: If you just need to refresh a single element you can use the load event on a non-ui element: `document.addEventListener('load', function () { document.getElementById('html').innerHTML = 'Yayyy'; }, false);` This will refresh once the DOM has been loaded. Regarding your comment: If I'm triggering a page reload, then that would cause the page to reload again after it's already reloaded? - No, it would not. The page is loaded once and only once, even if it is loaded several times as part of AJAX operations. This is because the browser only fetches the JavaScript once, there's no hidden reloads.
